Dietary supplementation with essential phospholipids in preterm infants: a randomized, double blind, placebo-controlled trial. The essential phospholipids (EPL) used in formula do not include arachidonate, which is involved in multiple important metabolic and physiologic processes. The purpose of this study was to test the hypothesis that preterm infants receiving a formula supplemented with EPL would demonstrate improved metabolic and physiologic development. A randomized, double blind, placebo-controlled trial was performed on 130 preterm infants. Infants were randomized to receive one of three formulas: (1) control formula (n = 44), (2) control formula supplemented with 3% of total energy as EPL (n = 43), or (3) control formula supplemented with 6% of total energy as EPL (n = 43). The primary outcomes, assessed at the equivalent of 26 weeks' gestation, were motor composite score and the Bayley Mental Development Index. Secondary outcomes were the number of days in hospital and weight gain during the study period. The proportion of infants who showed a significant increase in motor composite score was significantly greater in the EPL-supplemented group than in the control group (85% versus 30%; P = 0.002). The number of days in hospital was significantly less in the EPL-supplemented group than in the control group (median, 37 versus 48 days; P = 0.046). Weight gain was also significantly greater in the EPL-supplemented group than in the control group (median, 34.9 versus 22.8 g/kg/d; P = 0.038). This study indicates that supplementation of a preterm formula with 6% EPL is associated with an increased rate of normal neurological development and a shorter hospital stay compared to supplementation of a preterm formula with 3% EPL or no EPL.
